The rhythm of time

Tom is the Head of Technical Strategy at Royal Bank of Scotland. He has a total of 22 years banking experience. His initial grounding was in the IT industry, transferring those skills into banking at the Standard & Poors Group as an analyst for Interest Rate derivatives, progressing to run the Technical Analysis Rates Department before moving to Merrill Lynch in the mid 1990's as a senior strategist covering all asset classes. He then went to a hedge fund where he co-managed a USD 2bn fund for 3 years before leaving to set up his own consultancy firm. Tom later joined RBS where he is currently responsible for running the technical strategy for all asset classes covered by the bank.

Tom has a keen interest in cycles, believing there is no dualism between financial markets and natural cycles. He will talk about a variety of approaches to cycles in order to determine timing and price.

Attendees will have to have an open mind as he will challenge the concept of measuring time and look at the different cultural attempts to track time from the Mayan calendar to the Chinese/Japanese techniques, even heliotaraxy (effect of solar activity on the biosphere). Planetary alignments and well known cycles such as Kondratieff and Martin Armstrong's work will also be discussed. The conclusions will allude to recent events and coming events that can be forecasted by using a cycles approach in line with technical chart signals. Tom will show how to exploit these observations and incorporate them into a strategy for making profits in the future.
